Extracto: ...very well with pure white wine, and after that took his head, and into it synapised some powder of diamerdis, which he always carried about him in one of his bags. Afterwards he anointed it with I know not what ointment, and set it on very just, vein against vein, sinew against sinew, and spondyl against spondyl, that he might not be wrynecked, for such people he mortally hated.1 This done, he gave it round about some fifteen or sixteen stitches with a needle, that it might not fall off again, then, on all sides and everywhere, he put a little ointment on it, which he called resuscitative. Suddenly Epistemon began to breathe, then opened his eyes, yawned, sneezed. Whereupon Panurge said, Now, certainly, he is healed,--and therefore gave him to drink a large full glass of strong white wine with a sugared toast. In this fashion was Epistemon finely healed, only that he was somewhat hoarse for above three weeks together, and had a dry cough of which he could not be rid, but by the force of continual drinking. And now he began to speak, and said that he had seen the devil, had spoken with Lucifer familiarly, and had been very merry in hell, and in the Elysian fields, affirming very seriously before them all, that the devils were boon companions and merry fellows. But in respect of the damned, he said he was very sorry that Panurge had so soon called him back into this world again; For, said he, I took wonderful delight to see them. How so? said Pantagruel. Because they do not use them there, said Epistemon, so badly as you think they do. Their estate and condition of living is but only changed after a very strange manner; for I saw Alexander the Great there, mending and
