Excerpt: ... men with the boatswain and his crew to complete their bloody work; and I, seeing it quite out of my power to restrain them, came away pensive and sad, for I could not bear the sight, much less the horrible noise and cries of the poor wretches that fell into their hands. I got nobody to come back with me but the supercargo and two men, and with these I walked back to the boats. It was a very great piece of folly in me, I confess, to venture back as it were alone; for as it began now to be almost day, and the alarm had run over the country, there stood about forty men armed with lances and bows at the little place where the twelve or thirteen houses stood mentioned before, but by accident I missed the place, and came directly to the sea-side: and by the time I got to the sea-side it was broad day: immediately I took the pinnace and went aboard, and sent her back to assist the men in what might happen. I observed that about the time I came to the boatside the fire was pretty well out, and the noise abated; but in about half an hour after I got on board I heard a volley of our mens fire-arms, and saw a great smoke; this, as I understood afterwards, was our men falling upon the forty men, who, as I said, stood at the few houses on the way; of whom they killed sixteen or seventeen, and set all those houses on fire, but did not meddle with the women or children. By the time the men got to the shore again with VOL. II. S the pinnace our men began to appear; they came dropping in some and some, not in two bodies, and in form, as they went but all in heaps, stragglng here and there in such a manner that a small force of resolute men might have cut. them all off. But the dread of them was upon the whole country. The people were amazed and surprised, and so frightened that I be...
